Is Divorce Akin to “a Silence” or “a Confirmation”?

The Gemora had inquired: What does divorce do for any extant vows? Is it as if the husband merely said nothing, or is it as if the husband explicitly confirmed the vows? [The wife pronounced a vow, and the husband heard about it and divorced her. Do we say that since the arus knew that after the divorce he will not be able to revoke her vow, and he did not revoke it before the divorce, it is as if he upheld her vow – just as we say that if he didn’t revoke it on the day that he heard it, it is as if he upheld it, or is tantamount to silence?]

The Gemora noted that the practical difference between the two options would be in a case where she vowed, and her husband heard and divorced her, and then he proceeded to remarry her on that very day. If the master said that the divorce was akin to silence, he could still revoke the vow for her. If, however, the master said that it is akin to confirming the vow, he cannot revoke the vow for her.

The Gemora attempts to resolve this inquiry from the following braisa: When was it said that if the husband died, his authority to revoke her nedarim transfers to her father? It is in the case where her husband did not hear her neder before he died, or he heard it and revoked it, or he heard it and remained silent, and he died on that very same day. Now, if you will say that divorce is akin to silence, the braisa should also state: Or he heard and divorced her. Since the braisa did not state that case, it is a proof that divorce is regarded as confirming the vow.

The Gemora challenges the proof: Let us consider the last portion of the braisa: However, if the husband heard about her neder and he confirmed it, or he heard it and remained silent, and he died on the following day, the father is unable to revoke this neder. Now, if you will say that divorce is regarded as a confirmation, the braisa should also state: Or he heard and divorced her. Since the braisa did not state that case, it is a proof that divorce is akin to silence.

Rather, it is clear that no proof can be brought from this braisa. For if the first part of the braisa is written precisely, the Tanna wrote the latter part (imprecisely) because of the similarity to the first part (and he wanted to parallel the cases). And if the latter part of the braisa is written precisely, the Tanna wrote the first part (imprecisely) because of the similarity to the last part (and he wanted to parallel the cases).

The Gemora attempts to resolve this inquiry from our Mishna: If a woman makes a vow while she was an arusah (betrothed), and then proceeded to get divorced on that very same day, and then became betrothed to someone else on that very same day - even if this happens one hundred times, her father and current husband can revoke her vows of that day (for they can revoke vows made prior to her betrothal). It is evident that divorce is akin to silence, for if it would be regarded as a confirmation, how could the current husband revoke a vow that has been confirmed by the first one (assuming that the first husband heard about the vow)?

The Gemora answers: The Mishna is referring to a case where the first husband did not hear about the vow (and therefore, divorce is not regarded as a confirmation; for the logic that it should be a confirmation is that the husband knows that after the divorce, he will not be able to revoke her nedarim any longer, and from the fact that he did not revoke her neder beforehand; this indicates that he is, indeed, confirming it; this does not apply if he didn't hear about it).

The Gemora asks: If so, why did the Mishna specify that she was divorced and betrothed on that same day? The same halachah would apply if it happened after a hundred days!

The Gemora answers: The husband did not hear about the neder, but the father did. If it is still on that day, the father can revoke her vow, but afterwards, he may not.

The Gemora attempts to resolve this inquiry from the following Mishna: If she made a neder on the day she got married, and the husband divorced her and remarried her on that same day, he cannot revoke the vow. This would be a proof that divorce is regarded as a confirmation of her neder.

The Gemora deflects the proof: They said: The Mishna is referring to a nesuah, and the reason that the husband cannot revoke her vow is because the halachah is that a husband cannot revoke his nesuah's prior vows.

Ra"n Elucidated

[The Ra"n explains that it can be referring to a nesuah either in the marriage preceding the divorce or the one that followed it. If she was an arusah by the first marriage and a nesuah at the end, he would not be able to revoke her nedarim, for the husband cannot revoke pre-existing nedarim. If she was a nesuah by the first marriage and an arusah at the end, he cannot revoke her nedarim, for once she is a nesuah, the father loses his rights over her, and the arus is not able to revoke her vows without the conjunction of her father.] [The Gemora leaves this question unresolved, and there is a discussion in the Rishonim regarding the practical ruling.](71b1 – 72a2)

Mishna

The Mishna states: It was the custom of Torah scholars before their daughters would leave their authority, he (the father) would say to her (his daughter): All nedarim that you made in my house are revoked. And similarly, the husband would say before she entered his authority: All nedarim that you made before you entered my authority are revoked. This is because once she enters into his authority (as a nesuah), he cannot revoke her vows (that were made beforehand). (72b1)

Is Hearing Necessary?

Rami bar Chama inquired: May a husband revoke her vow without hearing about it? Since the verse in the Torah states "And the husband heard," he cannot revoke unless he heard about it, or perhaps, those words were not meant to be specific (and the Torah is just discussing the usual case)?

Rava attempts to resolve this inquiry from our Mishna: It was the custom of Torah scholars before their daughters would leave their authority, he would say to her: All nedarim that you made in my house are revoked. And here he is revoking her vows without even hearing it!

The Gemora rejects the proof: He actually revokes her vows when he hears about them.

The Gemora asks: If so, why does he make this declaration before he hears about them?

The Gemora answers: It was customary for the Torah scholars to find out if their daughters made any nedarim (and when they hear about them, they will revoke them).

The Gemora attempts to resolve the inquiry from the last part of the Mishna: And similarly, the husband would say before she entered his authority: All nedarim that you made before you entered my authority are revoked.

The Gemora deflects this proof as well, by saying that the Mishna means that he will revoke her vows after he hears them.

The Gemora attempts to resolve this inquiry from the following Mishna: One who says to his wife, "All nedarim which you will make until I come back from Such-and-such a place shall be confirmed," he has said nothing (for these nedarim are not in existence yet). If, however, he said, "they shall be revoked," Rabbi Eliezer said: They are revoked. And here he is revoking her vows without even hearing it!

The Gemora rejects the proof: He means that they should be revoked when he hears about them.

The Gemora asks: So why does he make that declaration? Let him revoke the vows when he hears them.

The Gemora answers: He is worried that he will become preoccupied with other matters at that time (and he will forget to revoke them).

The Gemora attempts to resolve this inquiry from the following braisa: One who says to guardian (one who will be taking care of his property in order to sustain his wife and children while he is away), "All nedarim that my wife will make from now until I return from Such-and-such a place, you shall revoke." If the guardian went and revoked them, you might think that her vows are indeed revoked. The Torah teaches us: Her husband will confirm them and her husband will revoke them. These are the words of Rabbi Yoshiyah. Rabbi Yonasan said to him: Throughout the Torah, we find that an agent of a person is just like himself (and therefore, the guardian may revoke her vows for the husband).

And even Rabbi Yoshiyah only disagreed because of the Scriptural verse, but otherwise, they would all agree that the agent can revoke her nedarim. But the husband never heard the neder (this would prove that he can revoke her nedarim without hearing them first)!

Ra"n Elucidated

[The Ra"n asks: Perhaps, hearing is necessary, but here it is different, because the hearing of the guardian, who is the representative of the husband is just like him, and it is as if the husband heard himself? Tosfos answers: If it is true that hearing is necessary, is there anything that the husband cannot do, yet he can appoint an agent to do that for him? This is a rule by all agents. One cannot appoint an agent to do something that he himself cannot do.]

The Gemora rejects this proof as well: The braisa is referring to a case where the husband told the guardian, "When I hear about the vows, revoke them for me."

The Gemora asks: Why can't the husband revoke them himself?

The Gemora answers: He is worried that he will become preoccupied with other matters at that time (and he will forget to revoke them). (72b1 – 73a1)

INSIGHTS TO THE DAF

Pre-existing Conditions

The Gemora stated that the Mishna is referring to a nesuah, and the reason that the husband cannot revoke her vow is because the halachah is that a husband cannot revoke his nesuah's prior vows.

The Ra"n explains that it can be referring to a nesuah either in the marriage preceding the divorce or the one that followed it. If she was an arusah by the first marriage and a nesuah at the end, he would not be able to revoke her nedarim, for the husband cannot revoke pre-existing nedarim. If she was a nesuah by the first marriage and an arusah at the end, he cannot revoke her nedarim, for once she is a nesuah, the father loses his rights over her, and the arus is not able to revoke her vows without the conjunction of her father.

The Reshash notes that it would seem from this Ra"n that a husband after nisuin can indeed revoke the nedarim that his wife made while she was an arusah. For otherwise, the Mishna did not have to mention that he divorced her and then remarried her. He cites the Rambam's opinion that the husband may not revoke the nedarim that his wife made while she was an arusah.

There are those that explain the argument as follows: Does the husband have authority over his wife's nedarim, while she is an arusah? If you say that the husband has no authority then; it is only in conjunction with her father that he may revoke her nedarim, we can explain the Rambam's opinion. Once they perform nisuin, the husband acquires the authority to revoke her nedarim, but he can only use this authority on nedarim that his wife makes from now on. However, if you will say that the husband does have authority to revoke her vows even during the erusin, except that this authority is limited in the fact that he may only revoke her nedarim in conjunction with her father, we can understand the Ra"n's opinion. The husband may revoke the nedarim that his wife made during erusin, for this is not regarded as a pre-existing neder, since he had the authority to revoke this neder even beforehand.

DAILY MASHAL

Man Speaks; God Fulfills

It is written: If a man vows a neder to Hashem, or swears an oath, to forbid a prohibition upon himself, he shall not (yachel) desecrate his word; according to whatever comes from his mouth shall he do.

Rashi writes (explaining the word 'yachel'): He shall not make his words chullin – non-sacred.

When man was created, the Torah writes: And He blew into his nostrils the soul of life. Onkelos explains this to mean the power of speech.

The Zohar writes that the Holy One, Blessed be He, blew into man the power of speech which is holy, and that is why the Torah states: the voice is the voice of Yaakov. This explains how man can consecrate an animal, and the holiness spreads throughout the animal. It is also why the words of Torah, which is recited by a person, may sway him and move him closer to Hashem.

We are commanded to recite shema twice daily, study Torah, recite blessings and prayers, but on the condition that we do not desecrate our words. A person who guards his power of speech and does not desecrate it will merit that "according to whatever comes from his mouth shall He do." The Holy One, Blessed be He, will do whatever it is that comes out from such a person's mouth – He will listen to his prayers and requests.
