Cutting off All Hair, Including the Corners

The Gemora asks: Let us say that whether or not cutting off all hair on one’s head including the corners is permitted is argued about by the Tannaim. The braisa states: “His head.” What does this teach us? Being that there is a prohibition against rounding off the corners of one’s head, one might think that even when a metzora shaves, he should not do this. The Torah therefore states: “His head.” A different braisa states: “His head.” What does this teach us? Being that it says regarding a nazir, “A razor should not pass over his head,” one might think this even applies to a nazir who became a metzora (that he should not perform the normally required shaving of a metzora within his time of nezirus). The Torah therefore says, “His head.”

It must be that this is an argument among the Tannaim. The braisa that says that “His head,” overrides the concerns of shaving while being a nazir holds that there is no problem when shaving all of the hair on his head. [This is why no verse was required to say that it is not a concern because of the basic law against shaving off the corners.] The verse was necessary only to override the negative and positive prohibition against cutting one’s hair when they are a nazir. However, according to the other braisa, it seems that it is normally forbidden to cut off the corners whether or not one cuts off all the hair on his head. “His head” was therefore needed to push aside the negative prohibition against doing so.

Rava answers: No! Everyone really agrees that there is no prohibition when cutting off all of one’s hair. The verse (in the first braisa) is regarding one who first cuts off his the corners and then cuts off the rest of his hair. As he is not liable for shaving off all the hair at one time, he is also not liable for shaving them one at a time.

The Gemora asks: Could this really be the intent of the verse? Didn’t Rish Lakish say: Whenever there is a positive and negative commandment, if possible, they should both be fulfilled. If they conflict, the positive commandment should push aside the negative commandment.

[This implies that the Torah would not tell us that it is permitted to shave in a way that is forbidden if it is possible to clearly do this in a way that is permitted. Accordingly, why would the verse also allow shaving the corners and only later shaving the hair?]

The Gemora therefore says: Everyone agrees that it is forbidden to cut off the corners, even when cutting off all of the hair on one's head as well.

The Gemora asks: According to the braisa that used the verse "His head" to push aside the prohibitions of nazir, what is his source to push aside the regular prohibition of cutting off one's corners?

The Gemora answers: He derived this from the mitzvah of tzitzis. The Torah states the prohibition, "Do not wear shatnez (mixture of linen and wool)." However, the braisa states that we derive (from the fact they are next to each other in the Torah) that one could make tzitzis that contain shatnez.

The Gemora asks: Why doesn't the one who derives that the verse "His head" excludes the prohibition against cutting off the corners, learn this instead from tzitzis?

The Gemora answers: He will tell you that the teaching is needed for Rava's teaching. Rava asked: One verse states, "And you will put on the tzitzis of the corner of the garment," implying any garment, "a string of techeiles." However, when the Torah mentions shatnez and tzitzis next to each other, it says, "wool and linen." This implies that wool and linen garments have a different status regarding tzitzis. What do we derive? Rava explains that wool or linen tzitzis can be used for any garment (made out of any material) to fulfill its obligation of tzitzis, while tzitzis made out of other material can only be used to fulfill an obligation of tzitzis for a garment made out of the same material.

The Gemora asks: How does the Tanna who derives from the verse "His head" that there is no prohibition for a metzora to shave off the corners, derive that this is also true regarding a nazir who is a metzora?

The Gemora answers: He derives it from the word, "His beard." The braisa states: "His beard." What does this teach us? The Torah states, "They should not shave the corners of their heads." One would think that this is even true by a Kohen who is a metzora. The verse therefore states, "His beard." [This shows us that the prohibition is pushed aside in special situations (i.e. nazir) as well, just like it is pushed aside by a Kohen (see Tosfos).]

The Gemora asks: Why doesn't the author of the other braisa derive this from the lesson learned from "His beard?"

The Gemora counters: According to this question, we should ask the following: Everyone generally holds that a positive commandment does not push aside both a positive and negative commandment. Why don't we derive from this teaching that it does?

The Gemora answers: It is therefore apparent that we do not derive from Kohen, as the prohibitions here regarding Kohen are not equal to all (and are therefore more easily pushed aside than other prohibitions). This means that we should also be unable to derive nazir from Kohen, as it is a prohibition that does not apply to all. [This is the reason why the author of the other braisa does not derive nazir from Kohen.]

The Gemora asks: According to the opinion that derives from “His head,” that the shaving of a metzora even applies by a metzora who is a nazir, what does he derive from the words, “His beard?”

The Gemora answers: He uses it as does the following braisa. The braisa states: “His beard.” What does this teach us? The Torah states, “They should not shave the corners of their head.” One would think that this is even true by a Kohen who is a metzora. The verse therefore states, “His beard.”

The Gemora asks: How do we know that he can even shave it off with a razor?

The Gemora answers the question from a braisa. The braisa states: “They should not shave the corners of their heads.” One might think that he is even liable if he shaves with a scissors. The verse therefore states: “And you should not destroy.” If the prohibition is destroying, one would think that shaving with planes would make one liable. The verse says: “And they should not shave off their corners.” What is a case of shaving that entails destroying? This must mean shaving with a razor.

The Gemora asks: According to the opinion that derives from, “His head” that there is no prohibition against shaving with a razor when shaving a metzora, why doesn’t he derive all of these prohibitions from the verse of “His beard?” Let him derive that this excludes both the general prohibition against shaving and any specific prohibitions including a positive and negative commandment (such as Kohen and nazir)? [Additionally, the Gemora implies, one could have derived from “His head,” excluding nazir, and would not need “His beard.”]

The Gemora answers: One verse permitting shaving by a nazir could not be used to also tell us about a Kohen, as a nazir is a lenient type of prohibition because it can be permitted (through annulling the vow). Similarly, one verse permitting shaving even by a Kohen would not tell us a nazir is permitted, as the prohibition regarding a Kohen only applies to a certain sect of people (i.e. Kohanim, and therefore cannot be used to teach us about other prohibitions). This is also the reason why we generally cannot derive from Kohen and nazir to other prohibitions, as we have stated previously. (57b – 58b)

DAILY MASHAL

Reasons for a Mitzvah

The Tur (Y”D 181) cites the Rambam who writes that the Torah prohibits rounding the corners of one’s head and destroying one’s beard because it was the practice of idolaters.

The Tur writes that we do not need to seek out the reasons for mitzvos, for they are the King's commandments, even if we do not understand the reason.

The Beis Yosef defends the Rambam, and he writes that there is no one who is concerned for the honor of the Torah and its mitzvos more than the Rambam. Although the laws of the Torah can be decrees from the King, nevertheless, wherever a reason for the mitzvah is found, it may be said. Whenever a reason cannot be found, it should be attributed to our shallow understanding. We are, nonetheless, obligated to fulfill those mitzvos that we do not understand its reasons in the same manner as we are obligated to fulfill those mitzvos that we do understand.

He concludes that the Rambam did not think up the reason for these mitzvos himself; rather, he saw from the juxtaposition of the verses that this is the reason for these prohibitions.

The Rama explains the Tur: Heaven forbid to think that the Tur suspected the Rambam to mean that if one does not understand the rationale for a mitzvah, he is not obligated to fulfill it. No sage will believe such a thing! However, those heretics who deny the truth of the Torah only believe in a mitzvah that they understand its reason. Rather, the following is the way that the Tur understood the Rambam: It is only if one shaves his head or destroys his beard in the same manner that the idolaters do; that is when one has transgressed this prohibition. The Tur writes that it is forbidden in any fashion whatsoever. Since the reason is not explicit in the Torah, the prohibition always applies. There is no room for leniency in a place where the reason is not applicable!
