Daily Daf

The Sin of an Anointed Kohen

The Mishna had stated: If he ruled deliberately and acted unintentionally (he is exempt from the korban, for the laws of the Anointed Kohen's ruling for himself is the same as the court's ruling for the community).

The Gemora asks: How do we know this? The Gemora answers with a braisa. The braisa states: The verse states: to the guilt of the nation. This indicates that the Anointed Kohen is like the nation.

The braisa asks: Could this not have been derived through a kal vachomer. The public (who brings a bull) has different laws than an individual (who brings a female lamb or goat) regarding the liability for a chatas, as does the Anointed Kohen (who brings a bull). Just as the public is only liable if the court inadvertently ruled erroneously and the public sinned inadvertently, so too the Anointed Kohen is only liable if he ruled inadvertently and sinned accidentally. On the other hand, you can argue as follows: We can compare the Anointed Kohen to a Nasi in a similar fashion. Both of them do not have the same law as an individual (for the Nasi brings a male goat). Just as a Nasi brings a chatas if he transgresses inadvertently even without forgetting that it was forbidden, so too the Anointed Kohen should be subject to a chatas if he transgresses inadvertently without forgetting that it was forbidden.

Who is the Anointed Kohen more similar to? The public brings a bull and never brings an asham taluy (when it was questionable if a transgression was committed), just like the Anointed Kohen. Just as the public is only liable if the court inadvertently ruled erroneously and the public sinned inadvertently, so too the Anointed Kohen is only liable if he ruled inadvertently and sinned accidentally. On the other hand, you can argue as follows: Both a Nasi and the Anointed Kohen bring a female goat if they transgressed idolatry and they both bring an asham vadai (a definite asham; brought for certain sins). We should therefore say that just as a Nasi brings a chatas if he transgresses inadvertently even without forgetting that it was forbidden, so too the Anointed Kohen should bring a chatas if he transgresses inadvertently without forgetting that it was forbidden. This is why the verse says: to the guilt of the nation. The Torah is teaching us that the Anointed Kohen is like the nation. Just as the public is only liable if the court ruled inadvertently and they sinned accidentally, so too the Anointed Kohen is only liable if he ruled inadvertently and sinned accidentally.

The braisa continues: Perhaps we should say that just as a court that rules erroneously must bring a communal-error bull if the public followed their ruling, so too a bull should be brought by the Anointed Kohen if the people followed a mistaken ruling of his. This is why the verse says: And he will offer, for his sin that he sinned. He only offers sacrifices for his sins, not for those of others.

The braisa had stated: The Anointed Kohen brings a bull and never brings an asham taluy.

The Gemora asks: How do we know this? The verse says: And the Kohen will atone for him for the inadvertent sin that he inadvertently committed. This implies that an asham taluy only applies to someone whose sin is like his inadvertence (meaning that he brings a chatas for an inadvertent act). This excludes the Anointed Kohen, whose inadvertence and sin are not similar. This is as the verse states: to the guilt of the nation. The Torah is teaching that the Anointed Kohen is like the nation.

The Gemora asks: It can't be that the source for this is the verse: to the guilt of the nation! [This is because without this verse we already know that the public brings a bull and never brings an asham taluy, just like the Anointed Kohen. We would clearly compare the two without this verse!]

The Gemora answers: The verse indeed was just stated as an aside, and is not the source of the law. (6b – 7a)

Mishna

If the Anointed Kohen issued his own ruling and acted on his own ruling, he atones on his own (with a chatas bull). [Rashi explains that this is referring to a case where beis din also ruled erroneously at the same time, but regarding a different prohibition.] If he ruled along with court (regarding the same prohibition) and he acted along with the public, his atonement is with the public (through the communal-error bull). This is because the court is only liable if they rule to abolish part of a mitzvah and to keep part of a mitzvah, just like the Anointed Kohen. [The Mishna means that in many ways the Anointed Kohen is similar to beis din, and he will therefore atone with beis din.] The court is also not liable for idolatry unless they rule to abolish part of the commandment and to keep part of it. (7a)

The Gemora asks: How do we know this? The Gemora answers from a braisa. The braisa states: If he ruled along with the court (regarding the same prohibition) and he acted along with the public, one might think he should bring his own offering. (The braisa answers) This is a kal vachomer (that he should not bring his own offering). A Nasi and the Anointed Kohen are both unlike individuals. Just as a Nasi who sins independently brings his own atonement, and if he sins with the public he atones with the public, so too the Anointed Kohen who sins by himself brings his own atonement, and if he sins with the public he atones with the public. [Why should we think that he brings his own korban?]

The braisa answers that this kal vachomer is flawed. A Nasi atones with the rest of the nation on Yom Kippur, whereas a special korban must be brought for the Anointed Kohen! One might therefore think that the Anointed Kohen should bring his own atonement if he sins with the people as well. This is why the verse says: he will offer, for his sin that he sinned. This teaches us that if he committed his own sin, he is liable to bring his own korban. If he sinned together with everyone else, he atones with the public. (7a)

Who is the Outstanding Sage?

The Gemora discusses the case of the Mishna: What is the case? If the case is where the Anointed Kohen is an outstanding scholar as opposed to the members of the court, he should (obviously) bring his own atonement, as their ruling is not considered significant to him! The individuals of the nation should each offer a female lamb or goat!? [Rashi explains that this is due to the law that if the greatest sage was not present when the beis din ruled, their ruling is insignificant. If he wasn't with them, this means that each individual sinned independently, and it is not subject to the law of communal offerings.] If he is not a scholar compared to the members of the court, why should he atone separately? His ruling is insignificant!?

Rav Papa says: The case is where they are equally great scholars.

Abaye understood the Mishna's case as follows: If he sinned on his own, the case must be where he was in a different place than the court, and they ruled regarding two separate prohibitions.

Rava asked: Why is it relevant that they should be in two separate places? Rather, Rava said: They can be in the same place. As long as they are ruling regarding two separate prohibitions, he brings his own atonement.

The Gemora notes: It is obvious that if he ruled regarding forbidden fats and they ruled regarding idolatry that these are two separate sins, as the reasoning for them (their Scriptural verses) is very different, and they mandate bringing different atonements, as he would bring a bull, and they would bring a bull and a goat. Certainly if he rules regarding idolatry and they ruled regarding forbidden fats, they are different, as he brings a female goat and they bring a bull. However, what is the law if they permitted fat covering the innards and he permitted fat covering the intestines? Do we say that although they make one liable for the same korban, being that they are derived from two different verses they are considered like two separate prohibitions as they have two separate sources? Or do we say that they both are prohibited because they are forbidden fats of animals, and therefore should be considered the same?

If you would conclude that they are the same because they are both forbidden fats of animals, what if he rules regarding forbidden fats, and they rule regarding blood?

Do we say that being that they have two separate sources they are two different prohibitions, or do we say that being that they make one liable for the same korban they are considered one similar prohibition? The Gemora leaves these inquiries unresolved. (7a – 7b)

The Mishna had stated: The court is not liable unless they rule to partially nullify and partially uphold a law.

The Gemora asks: How do we know this? The Gemora answers: This is as we derived earlier in the first chapter that the verse says: and the matter will be hidden, implying that only part of a matter (i.e. mitzvah) will be nullified.

The Mishna had stated: The same applies regarding the Anointed Kohen.

The Gemora asks: How do we know this? The Gemora answers: The verse says: by the guilt of the nation implying that the Anointed Kohen is like the nation (in this regard).

The Mishna said: They are also not liable for idolatry unless they rule to abolish part of a mitzvah and to keep part of it.

The Gemora asks: How do we know this? The Gemora answers from a braisa. The braisa states: Being that idolatry is different than other sins, in that a goat must also be brought, one might think that one is only liable if the entire mitzvah is uprooted. The verse says: from the eyes both regarding idolatry and communal-error bull. Just as regarding communal-error bull it is dependent on a ruling from the court, so too regarding idolatry. Just as by the communal-error bull, only part of a mitzvah is nullified, so too regarding idolatry. (7b)

Mishna

The court is only liable (for the communal-error bull) if when there is an oversight regarding a law and the public inadvertently sin. This is also true regarding the Anointed Kohen. The same is true regarding idolatry. (7b)

Sources

The Gemora asks: How do we know this? The Gemora answers: The verse says: the entire congregation will inadvertently sin. One might think this alone is enough. This is why the verse says: And the matter will be hidden implying that one is only liable (helem davar) if they issued an erroneous ruling plus there was an inadvertent sin.

The Mishna said: The same applies regarding the Anointed Kohen.

The Gemora asks: How do we know this? The Gemora answers: The verse says: by the guilt of the nation implying that the Anointed Kohen is like the nation (in this regard).

The Mishna had stated: The same is true regarding idolatry.

The Gemora asks: How do we know this? The Gemora answers from a braisa, which states: Being that idolatry is different than other sins, in that a goat must also be brought, one might think that one is liable if they inadvertently sin (without forgetting). The verse says: from the eyes both regarding idolatry and the communal-error bull. Just as regarding the communal-error bull, it is dependent on a mistaken ruling from the court along with accidental sinning, so too regarding idolatry.

The Gemora asks: The Mishna does not address a the Anointed Kohen's korban for idolatry. This implies that the Mishna is according to Rebbe. The braisa states: The Anointed Kohen's korban for idolatry is brought if he inadvertently sins. These are the words of Rebbe. The Sages say: There must be a forgetting (i.e. mistaken ruling). They agree that he brings a female goat, and that he does not bring an asham taluy.

The Gemora replies: Does the Mishna say that the Anointed Kohen similarly brings a korban only on a sin which is punishable with kares and to bring a chatas if he does it accidentally? [It does not have to say every law that is similar regarding an Anointed Kohen! The assumption is that it is similar unless specified otherwise.] Rather, it says the general law, which also applies to an Anointed Kohen. The same is true for our Mishna.

The Gemora asks: What is Rebbe's reasoning? The verse says: And the Kohen will provide atonement for the person that accidentally sins when he sins inadvertently. The person refers to the Anointed Kohen; that accidentally sins refers to the Nasi; when he sins inadvertently refers to the fact that idolatry requires a korban when it is done through an act of inadvertence; these are the words of Rebbe. The Sages understand that this refers to a regular person whose accidental sin (not by idolatry) makes him bring a chatas, as opposed to the Anointed Kohen who does not bring a chatas for an inadvertent act, but rather if there was an oversight on the law along with an act of inadvertence.
