An Asham for Another Sacrifice

The Mishna stated that one is not liable for slaughtering an asham – guilt offering outside of the Bais Hamikdash before the owner was ready, since it is not fit for sacrifice inside.

Rav Chilkiyah bar Tuvi says that this is true only if he sacrificed it for its sake, since it is not yet fit for that purpose. However, if he sacrificed it for the sake of another type of sacrifice (e.g., olah – burnt offering), he is liable, since it would be valid inside for that purpose.

The Gemora explains that we don’t apply the same reasoning to one who sacrifices it outside as an asham, arguing that it would have been fit if it was offered as another type of sacrifice inside, since it would need a formal change of status to change it to a different sacrifice.

Rav Huna challenges this statement, asking how a sacrifice can be unfit when offered for its own sake, as it should be ultimately done, but fit when offered for the sake of another sacrifice.

The Gemora attempts to answer this challenge with the example of a pesach sacrifice during the rest of the year, which is invalid when offered as a pesach, and valid when offered as another sacrifice.

The Gemora deflects this, since a pesach during the rest of the year is legally considered a shelamim, and not a pesach.

The Gemora attempts to support Rav Chilkiyah from a braisa. The braisa says that we may have thought that one is not liable for sacrificing outside:

1. An olah before the owner is ready to bring it
2. The asham of a nazir
3. The asham of a metzora – leper

Therefore, the verse states that one is liable for sacrificing an ox, sheep, or goat. The list of these three animals includes these sacrifices.

The Gemora notes that the braisa does not list a chatas along with the asham. If the braisa is referring to an asham sacrificed when the owner is ready, it should have included a chatas, since one would be liable for both. The braisa must therefore be discussing an asham sacrificed before the owner is ready. If it is sacrificed for its sake, one is not liable. Therefore, the braisa must be referring to slaughtering it for the sake of another sacrifice. Since it says that one is liable, this supports Rav Chilkiyah.

The Gemora deflects this, saying that the braisa is referring to one who sacrificed the asham once the owner was ready, but not for its sake. The braisa does not list chatas, since it follows Rabbi Eliezer, who says that an asham and chatas are equivalent in being invalid when offered for the sake of another sacrifice. Since they are equivalent, the braisa listed only asham, with the understanding that chatas is also included, as asham derives from it. One is liable since it would be fit when offered inside for its sake.

The Gemora attempts to support Rav Chilkiyah from another braisa. The braisa says that we may have thought that one is liable for sacrificing outside:

1. An olah which itself is not yet ready (i.e., not 8 days old)
2. A chatas, which is not yet ready
3. A chatas, whose owner is not yet ready

The verse states that one is liable for sacrificing outside, since he did not bring it “to the door of the Mishkan,” teaching that one is only liable for a sacrifice that would be valid inside, excluding these cases.

The Gemora notes that this braisa omits an asham, implying that one would be liable for offering it outside. If the braisa is referring to one who sacrificed it for its sake, it should include an asham as well, since it is not valid as an asham before the animal or person is ready. Therefore, the braisa must be referring to sacrificing it for another sacrifice’s sake, proving Rav Chilkiyah’s position that one is liable for such a sacrifice outside.

The Gemora deflects this, saying the braisa follows Rabbi Eliezer, who says an asham is equivalent to a chatas. Therefore, the braisa is including asham when it lists chatas, since it derives from chatas.

The Gemora attempts to prove Rav Chilkiyah from a braisa of Rabbi Liva’i, cited by Rav Dimi, which contains the same argument as the first braisa, discussing one who sacrificed outside an olah whose owner is not yet ready, or the asham of a nazir or metzora, ultimately saying he is liable. The Gemora’s proof uses the same logic as that attempted earlier, and the Gemora attempts to deflect it as before, saying that this braisa follows Rabbi Eliezer.

Rav Nachman says that we cannot say that this braisa is discussing an asham whose owner is ready, as we suggested about the first braisa, due to the way we resolve a contradiction between this braisa and another braisa of Rabbi Levi. The braisa of Rabbi Levi says that if one slaughtered an asham of a nazir or metzora not for its sake, it is valid, but did not fulfill their obligation. If the owners were not yet ready, or if the animals were two years old (instead of the mandated age of one year old), they are invalid. This contradicts the braisa of Rabbi Liva’i, which implied that an asham of a nazir or metzora whose owner is not fit is still valid, and therefore one is liable for slaughtering it outside.

Rav Dimi answered the contradiction by saying that Rabbi Liva’i is referring to one who slaughtered the asham for another sacrifice’s sake, for which it is valid, while Rabbi Levi is referring to slaughtering it for its sake, which is invalid. Rabbi Liva’i’s braisa therefore must be discussing one who slaughtered the asham before the owner was ready, but not for its sake, supporting Rav Chilkiyah’s position that one is liable.

Rav Ashi said that our Mishna seems to contradict the first braisa about the ruling for one who sacrifices outside an asham of a nazir or metzora who are not yet ready.

Rav Ashi answered that the Mishna, which says one is not liable, refers to slaughtering it for its sake, which is not valid, while the braisa, which says one is liable, refers to slaughtering it for another sacrifice’s sake, which is valid.

The Gemora suggests that this resolution refutes Rav Huna’s challenge.

The Gemora deflects this, saying that Rav Huna would resolve this contradiction by saying the braisa refers to a case where one set aside two animals for an asham, with one as a reserve, in case one gets lost. In such a case, once the first animal is offered, the second is left to graze until it has a blemish, and then sold, with the proceeds used to buy an olah. Therefore, one of these two is already considered an olah, and is valid if slaughtered as an olah. (114b – 115b)

Sacrificing what Outside?

The Mishna listed items for which one is not liable for sacrificing outside. The Gemora cites a braisa which explains the source for these exclusions. The verse punishing one for sacrificing outside uses the example of offering an olah. From this we learn that one is only liable for sacrificing things like an olah, i.e., fit for offering on the altar, excluding these items, which are not offered on the altar:

1. The meat of non olah sacrifices
2. Leftovers of the omer barley offering offered on the second day of Pesach
3. The two loaves of bread offered on Shavuos
4. The show bread taken off the table every Shabbos
5. Leftovers of minchah offerings

Since the verse describes one who “raises up” a sacrifice, this limits it to a form of sacrifice that is the end of the process, like placing on the altar. This excludes other stages of sacrificing, such as:

1. Pouring oil on the minchah
2. Mixing it together
3. Crushing it
4. Salting sacrifices
5. Waving the minchah
6. Bringing the minchah to the altar’s corner
7. Placing the show bread on the table
8. Tending to the lights of the menorah
9. Taking the kometz – handful from the minchah
10. Receiving the blood (115b)

Pre-Mishkan Times

The Mishna said that before the Mishkan was established, the firstborn performed the service.

Rav Huna bar Rav Ketina was sitting before Rav Chisda, who read the verse which states “and he [Moshe] sent the lads of Bnei Yisroel,” referring to the firstborns.

Rav Huna said that Rav Assi said that this was the end of the service by the firstborn, since by the time the Torah was given, Nadav and Avihu, the Kohanim, were given the job of the service.

Rav Chisda planned to challenge this from our Mishna, which states that the first born performed the service until the time of the Mishkan, but he then heard him quote Rav Adda bar Ahavah saying that the olah offered in the Sinai desert (before the Mishkan) did not require skinning and dismembering.

He then decided to challenge both statements from one braisa, which states that before the Mishkan was established:

1. Private altars were permitted
2. The firstborn performed the service
3. Sacrifices could be offered from all animals or birds, domesticated or wild, male or female, blemished or whole, but only pure ones
4. All sacrifices were olah ones

The braisa continues, saying that the olah offered in the Sinai desert before the Mishkan required skinning and dismembering. The braisa concludes by saying that all of these exceptions to the regular rules of service apply nowadays to non-Jews.

This braisa thus challenges both Rav Huna’s statement that the firstborn did not perform the service at the time of the matan torah - giving of the Torah, and his statement that the olah before the Mishkan did not need skinning and dismembering.

The Gemora answers that there is a dispute of Tannaim about these points.

The Gemora cites a braisa about the verse in which Hashem tells Moshe at the time of the Giving of the Torah that “the Kohanim who come close to Hashem should separate.” Rabbi Yehoshua ben Karchah says this refers to the firstborn, while Rebbe says it refers to Nadav and Avihu. Rav Huna follows Rebbe, while the braisa cited by Rav Chisda follows Rabbi Yehoshua ben Karchah.

The Gemora says that according to Rebbe we can understand what Moshe meant when he told Aharon after Nadav and Avihu's death that "this is what Hashem said, 'with the ones close to Me, I will become sanctified,'" as he was referring to the verse in the braisa. Since Nadav and Avihu came too close, Hashem followed through on the second part of the verse, which states, "lest Hashem break them." However, according to Rabbi Yehoshua ben Karchah, what prior statement of Hashem was Moshe referring to?

The Gemora answers that Hashem had stated, "He will meet Bnei Yisroel in the Mishkan, and it will be sanctified bichvodi – in my honor". The last word can be read instead as bimchubadai – through those who are His honored ones, hinting that Hashem would become sanctified through the death of righteous people. Moshe had not understood this verse at the time, but when Nadav and Avihu died, he told Aaron that his sons died to sanctify Hashem's name. When Aaron understood that his sons had become so close to Hashem, he was silent, and was rewarded for his silence.

The Gemora cites the verse which refers to Aaron as dom – silent, and associates this with the verse of Dovid, who said be silent to Hashem "v'hischolel lo – even if he presents you with corpses [chalalim]."

The Gemora also associates this with the verse of Shlomo, who said that there is a time for speech and a time for silence, as sometimes one is rewarded for speech, but sometimes one is rewarded for silence.

The Gemora says that this understanding of Nadav and Avihu's death follows Rav Chiya bar Abba quoting Rabbi Yochanan, who says that the verse which says that Hashem is awesome mimikdash – from Your holy place can be read mimukadeshecha – from those who are Your holiest. The verse means that when Hashem metes out strict justice to His holy ones, He is more feared, praised, and exalted among everyone, as was illustrated in the case of Nadav and Avihu's death.

The Gemora says that the second challenge about the rules of an olah before the Mishkan can also be resolved, since it is also a dispute of Tannaim.

The Gemora cites a braisa about the timeline of the all rules given in the Torah. Rabbi Yishmael says that the general rules were taught at Mount Sinai, but the full details were only taught in the Mishkan, while Rabbi Akiva says that the general rules and the details were taught at Mount Sinai, repeated in the Mishkan, and repeated again in the plains of Moav before entering Eretz Yisroel.

The Gemora now returns to the braisa, discussing its statements in more detail. The braisa said that all animals and birds were valid as sacrifices. Rav Huna says the source is the verse which states that after the flood Noach built an altar and offered on it from "all pure behema - animals and birds." The word beheimah includes both domesticated and wild animals, so this verse includes domesticated and wild animals and birds, male or female, blemished or whole, but not any missing a limb. (115b – 116a)

INSIGHTS TO THE DAF

The Firstborn vs. the Kohanim

The Gemora relates a dialogue between Rav Huna bar Rav Ketina and Rav Chisda. Rashi and Tosfos differ on the details of this dialogue.

The Gemora begins by stating that Rav Huna was sitting in front of Rav Chisda, and he read the verse which states that Moshe sent the lads of Bnei Yisroel (i.e., the firstborn). Rashi says that the one reading the verse was Rav Chisda, while Tosfos (115b v'yasiv) says that it was Rav Huna.

The Gemora continues, saying that he said that Rav Assi said, "and they stopped", and Rav Chisda considered challenging this statement from the Mishna, which says that the service was performed by the firstborn until the Mishkan was established.

Rashi and Tosfos offer various explanations of what "they stopped" means, and how it is inconsistent with our Mishna. Rashi offers two explanations:

1. The firstborn performed the service that day, but then stopped, at which time the Kohanim took over. This was well before the establishment of the Mishkan, contradicting our Mishna.
2. The verse should be paused at this point. Rav Huna was saying that the continuation of the verse, which says, "and they offered sacrifices," is not connected to the mention of the firstborn, but rather refers to the Kohanim. The beginning of the verse simply means that Moshe sent the firstborn to oversee the sacrifices, but not to actually offer them. According to this reading, the firstborn never performed the service, contradicting the Mishna.

Tosfos (115b Amar) suggests that the dialogue was that Rav Huna said that Rav Assi agreed with the simple reading of the verse, implying that the firstborn performed the service, but "they [the Sages] stopped" Rav Assi from saying this, since they did not perform the service. This therefore contradicts the Mishna.

The Gemora discusses the death of Nadav and Avihu. The Gemora explains that if the Kohanim referred to at the time of the Giving of the Torah do not refer to them, then the prior statement indicating that they would die was Hashem's saying that the Mishkan will be sanctified bichvodi – in my honor.

The Gemora says that Moshe did not understand the import of this statement until Nadav and Avihu died. Tosfos (115b Remazo) explains, based on the Medrash, that Moshe understood that it meant that one of Hashem's honored would die, but he thought it would be Moshe or Aaron. When he saw that it was Nadav and Avihu, he told Aaron that it seems that they were even greater than Moshe or Aaron.

The Gemora continues to say that Aaron was rewarded for his silence when his sons died. Tosfos (115b v'kibel) cites the Toras Kohanim which says that the reward was the fact that the next portion of the Torah, detailing the prohibition of performing the service when intoxicated, was said only to Aharon. Tosfos explains, based on the Sifri that all commandments from Hashem were first told to Moshe, even when the verse says that Hashem spoke to Aaron. However, the reward was that Hashem did not tell Moshe to tell of the Bnei Yisroel equally, but rather to first tell Aaron.

DAILY MASHAL

Noach and the Flood

Noach, seems at first glance quite contradictory. On the one hand, the Torah itself explicitly testifies that he was perfectly righteous, and he alone merited to be saved from the destruction which befell his contemporaries. Everyone alive today is descended from him and exists only in his merit. On the other hand, Rashi points out that some Sages question how pious Noach truly was. They point out that the verse emphasizes that he was righteous in his generation, which can be read as implying that if he had lived in another generation, such as that of Avrohom Avinu, he wouldn't have been considered unique or special in any way. This is difficult to understand. If the Torah explicitly praises Noach, why do Chazal minimize his greatness, and why do they specifically compare him to Avrohom? Furthermore, if he was indeed so righteous, why wasn't he simply told to escape to Eretz Yisroel, which according to one opinion in our Gemora was miraculously protected and spared from the flood, until the waters subsided?

Reb Oizer Alpert cites the Zohar to answer these apparent contradictions. The Zohar questions why the Haftorah (Yeshaya 54:9) refers to the flood as the floodwaters of Noach. Since Noach was the righteous tzaddik who was spared from the destruction, why is the flood named for him, implying that he was somehow responsible for it? The Zohar answers that Hashem commanded Noach to make an Ark to save him and his family from the impending flood. During the 120 years that Noach was busy doing so, he neglected to pray for his contemporaries to repent their sins and be spared, and as a result, he was held accountable for the flood which may have been prevented through his prayers.

The Zohar HaKadosh teaches us that although Noach was personally righteous, he was content with his own individual piety to save himself and his family without being properly concerned about the welfare of his contemporaries. The Medrash compares Noach to a captain who saved himself while allowing his boat and its passengers to drown. With this insight, we can now appreciate that Noach's spiritual level was indeed complex and somewhat contradictory. He withstood the tremendous temptations to join the rest of his sinful generation and remained uniquely pious, yet at the same time he could have done much more on behalf of others.

Rav Moshe Shternbuch writes that this explains why Noach was forced to endure such a difficult and exhausting year in the Ark instead of living peacefully with his family in the land of Israel. Even though Noach was deemed sufficiently righteous to be saved and to repopulate the earth, he was simultaneously found lacking in the area of feeling compassion for others. In order to teach him this lesson, Hashem required him to spend the duration of the flood engaged in continuous chesed, feeding the various animals around the clock, each with its own unique menu and eating time.

Still, although it is important to do acts of kindness for others, the Meshech Chochmah points out that one might assume that he nevertheless loses out in the process, as the time and energy that he dedicates to others come at the expense of investing them in his own growth and development. However, he quotes a Medrash (Bereishis Rabbah 36:3) which points out that precisely the opposite is in fact the case. Although Noach is initially introduced as a perfectly righteous man, his lifelong focus on himself caused him to fall and be transformed into a man of the earth (9:20). In contrast, Moshe Rabbeinu, who dedicated his entire life to the welfare of others, was originally described (Shemos 2:19) as an Egyptian man who was forced into exile – but through his efforts on behalf of Klal Yisroel he elevated him to the pinnacle of perfection and was called (Devorim 33:1) a man of G-d, teaching us that a person never loses out by doing chesed for others.
