Half and Half is Whole?

The Gemora cites a dispute about one who planned on eating half a zayis – olive size unit at the wrong time, then planned on eating another half a zayis in the wrong place, and then planned on eating another half a zayis at the wrong time. Rava says that the first thought, although it had previously combined with the middle thought, reawakens and combines with the last thought, making this sacrifice piggul, punishable by kares. Rav Hamnuna says that the first thought is already joined with the middle one, and cannot join with the last one to make the sacrifice piggul.

Rava cites a proof from a Mishna about impurity. The Mishna says that if a beitzah – an egg unit of food impure at the first level mixes with a beitzah of food impure at the second level, the mixture has the status of the first level, since it contains the beitzah of the first level food. If the mixture was split, each part only has the status of second level food.

Rava infers from the Mishna that if they were reunited, the two halves of a beitzah of first level food would combine to give the mixture the status of first level. This is indicated from the continuation of the Mishna, which says that if the two halves separately touch a loaf of terumah, they only make it invalid (third level impurity), but if they simultaneously touch the loaf, they make it impure (second level impurity), showing that the combination of the two halves has the status of first level.

Rav Hamnuna deflects this proof, since in this Mishna there was a full amount (beitzah) of impure food at the outset, while in the case of piggul, there was never a k’zayis at one time that would make it piggul.

Rav Hamnuna cites a proof from another Mishna about impurity. The Mishna says that food that became impure due to contact with a source of impurity combines with food that became impure by contact with first level impurity, to jointly make something else impure at the lower level of the two foods.

Rav Hamnuna assumes that even if later more food was added to make a full unit of food made impure from a source of impurity, the food still only has the effect of the lower level food, since the original food already is combined.

Rava deflects this by saying the Mishna may only be discussing a case where no more food was added, but if more was added, it would have the status of first level impurity.

Rav Dimi said that if one planned to eat one half zayis in the wrong place, then planned on one half zayis at the wrong time, and then planned another half zayis at the wrong time, Bar Kapara says that the sacrifice is piggul, since the original half zayis cannot prevent the full zayis from the combination of the two latter halves.

Ravin quoted Bar Kapara saying that it is piggul even if the half zayis of the wrong place is in the middle.

Rav Ashi quoted Bar Kapara saying that it is piggul even if the sequence was half a zayis at the wrong time, and then a full zayis - half in the wrong place, and half at the wrong time. (31a)

What is “Eating”?

Rabbi Yannai says that if one planned for dogs to eat the sacrifice at the wrong time, it is piggul, since the verse classifies dogs eating meat as achilah – eating.

Rabbi Ami challenges this, since the verse also refers to a fire consuming something as achilah – eating, yet the Mishna says that planning on eating half a zayis and sacrificing half a zayis on the Altar does not make piggul, since eating and sacrificing do not combine. This indicates that that fire consuming it, as it does when sacrificing on the Altar, is not considered eating.

The Gemora deflects this proof by saying that if one planned for the fire to “eat” the meat, it would be piggul, since he used the terminology of “eating.” The Mishna is discussing one who planned to “sacrifice” it on the fire of the Altar, which is not the terminology of “eating.” (31a)

What Combines?

Rav Ashi asked whether a sacrifice is piggul if he planned for two people to together eat one zayis at the wrong time. Is it piggul, since a k'zayis will be eaten, or is it not piggul, since no one person will eat a k'zayis?

Abaye proves from the Mishna that it is piggul. The Mishna says that planning to eat half a zayis and sacrifice half a zayis does not combine, implying that planning for two half zayis's to be eaten (i.e., by two people) is piggul.

Rava asked whether a sacrifice is piggul if one planned to eat a k'zayis at the wrong time, over a period longer than the time to eat a pras – half a loaf of bread, which is the time within a person must eat a k'zayis of any prohibited food to be liable. If we compare the eating of the sacrifice at the wrong time to other mundane prohibited eating, which must be within this period, this intent would not make it piggul. But, if we compare it to the “eating” of the Altar, which takes a long time, this intent would make it piggul.

Abaye attempts to prove from the Mishna that it would be piggul. The Mishna says that planning to eat half a zayis and sacrifice half a zayis does not combine, implying that planning to eat two half zayis's in a similar fashion to sacrifice would be piggul. Since sacrificing takes longer, this would prove that it is piggul.

The Gemora deflects this, saying that perhaps the Mishna is referring to a large pyre on the Altar, which would consume a k'zayis during this period, and only eating similar to that would be piggul. (31a – 31b)

Thinking about what?

The Mishna says that if one planned on eating half a zayis and sacrificing half a zayis, this does not combine. The Gemora infers that if one planned to eat that second half zayis, instead of sacrificing it, it would be piggul, even though the half zayis that would be sacrificed is not normally eaten.

The Gemora says that this is inconsistent with the earlier section of the Mishna, which said that only intent to eat something “which is eaten” makes a sacrifice piggul.

Rabbi Yirmiyah says that the latter part of the Mishna is Rabbi Eliezer, who says consumption of the Altar and of a person are interchangeable.

The Gemora cites a Mishna about one who plans to eat something not normally eaten, or sacrifice something that is not normally sacrificed at the wrong time. The Sages say it is valid, as these are not valid forms of consumption, while Rabbi Eliezer says it is invalid, since the types of consumption are interchangeable.

Abaye says that this latter section can also follow the Sages, since the Mishna does not mean to infer that if one planned to eat the half zayis that would have been sacrificed, it would be piggul.

The Gemora attempts to explain what this section of the Mishna is teaching. It cannot be teaching that if one would plan to eat a second half zayis of meat (which is normally eaten), we already know that from the start of the Mishna, which says that if one planned on half a zayis at the wrong time and half a zayis in the wrong place, it is invalid. It cannot be teaching that eating and sacrificing do not combine, since we would know that from the earlier statement of the Mishna that planning to eat half a zayis of meat (which is normally eaten) and planning to eat half a zayis of sacrificed items (which are not normally eaten), does not make it piggul. If planning to eat these two items does not combine, even though they are both plans to eat, surely planning to eat one half and sacrifice one half should not combine, since they are two different actions.

The Gemora says that we would not know this from the first statement, since we may have thought that eating sacrificed items is not a valid act, and therefore cannot combine, but sacrificing these items, which is a normative act, may have combined. Therefore, the Mishna had to teach that they do not combine, and not to teach any other implications. (31b)

All may Sacrifice

The Mishna says that anyone who slaughters a sacrifice is valid, since slaughtering any sacrifice (even the more severe kodshei kodashim) may be done by all – non-Kohanim, women, slaves, and impure people, as long as an impure person does not touch the meat. Since their slaughtering is valid, any incorrect thoughts they had invalidates the sacrifice. (31b)

INSIGHTS TO THE DAF

Combining Halves

The Gemora cites a dispute between Rava and Rav Hamnuna about whether planning to eat half a k'zayis at the wrong time, followed by planning to eat half a zayis in the wrong place, can combine with a final plan to eat another half k'zayis at the wrong time. Rava cites a proof that it does combine from a Mishna which states that a beitzah of rishon food (at the first level of impurity) that combines with a beitzah of sheini food (at the second level) retains its status, even when the mixture was split and recombined. Rav Hamnuna deflects this by saying that “there, you have a unit, but here you do not.”

Rashi learns that Rav Hamnuna is saying that in the case of impurity, you began with a full unit, and therefore its combination with the sheini food does not prevent it from recombining later to retain the status of a beitzah of rishon food. However, in the case of piggul, there never was a full unit of a k'zayis before it combined with the second plan, and therefore it cannot combine.

Rabbeinu Tam (Tosfos 31a Hasam) objects, saying that the Rav Hamnuna should have said, “there, you had a unit.” Instead, Rabbeinu Tam says that Rav Hamnuna is referring to the sheini food, and says that since the sheini food had a full unit, it does not attach the rishon food to itself, allowing to recombine with its other half later.

Rav Hamnuna cites a proof that they do not combine from a Mishna which states that food that is a rishon combines with food that is sheini to create a unit of a beitzah at the status of sheini.

Rashi, who limits Rav Hamnuna to a case where there never was a full unit before the first mixture, must understand this Mishna to refer to a case of rishon food which was never a beitzah, but became impure when being less than a beitzah.

Rashi, following his position in many other places, says that although food cannot make other things impure unless it has a beitzah unit, it itself can become impure even if it is less than a beitzah.

Rabbeinu Tam differs, and maintains that food cannot itself become impure if it is less than a beitzah.

However, Tosfos (31a Amar) explains that Rabbeinu Tam can explain this Mishna as a case where the rishon food came from a full beitzah that had become impure, since Rav Hamnuna does not say that any time the original food had a unit, it cannot recombine. As long as the mixture it joined does not have a unit, the first food cannot recombine. Therefore, even if the rishon food came from a beitzah, as long as the sheini food it fell into does not now have a beitzah, it cannot recombine with other rishon food later.

Women Slaughtering

The Mishna states that slaughtering of a sacrifice is valid, no matter who performed it. The Mishna includes women in the list of those whose slaughtering is valid.

Tosfos (31b Shehashechita) notes that the Gemora says that not only is their slaughtering valid, they are permitted to slaughter. Of the list mentioned in the Mishna, only someone impure is not permitted to slaughter, since we are concerned he may make the sacrifice impure. Nonetheless, if he did slaughter without touching the animal, the slaughtering is valid.

Tosfos notes that the book "Hilchos Eretz Yisroel" prohibits women from slaughtering animals (for regular consumption), but this Mishna and Gemora disprove this restriction. Similarly, this book states that if one slaughtered without a blessing or when not clothed, the slaughtering is invalid, but there is no such indication in the Gemora. Tosfos concludes that the restrictions in this book are stringencies created by the author, and not mandated by the Gemora. The Shulchan Aruch (YD 1:1) rules like Tosfos, and permits women to slaughter, while the Rama notes that the custom is to not allow women to slaughter. See Bais Yosef (YD 1) and Shach (YD 1:1) for further details on this custom.

DAILY MASHAL

Eli Ruled That Chanah Could Slaughter

Chazal recount in Berachos 31b that when Chanah brought her son Shmuel to the Sanctuary at Shiloh, he ruled in the presence of Eli HaKohen that a sacrifice may be slaughtered by a non-Kohen. Though Eli agreed with him, he condemned him to death for ruling halachah in the presence of his rav. Then Chanah cried out, "I am the woman who was standing here with you." What kind of answer was that?

But from the verse "who was standing with you" (Shmuel I, 1:26), Chazal learnt (Berachos, ibid.) that one mustn't sit within 4 amos of someone who is praying, as Eli also stood while she was praying.

HaGaon Rav M.Y. Zaksh of Yerushalayim zt"l said that that is because someone who is praying is like someone who is offering a sacrifice and his place is like the Azarah and "there is no sitting in the 'Azarah."

That was Chanah's answer to Eli: You stood while I was praying though I am a woman and disqualified for service in the Sanctuary and it could only be because I am fit to slaughter. If so, you have already ruled that we don't need a kohen to slaughter and therefore Shmuel didn't innovate anything when he said that a non-kohen may slaughter as you ruled so a few years ago and the matter is well known (Milei DeMordechai).
