What’s Necessary for Chatas?

The Gemora cites a braisa which provides a different source for Bais Hillel’s position that a chatas is valid with even only one application of blood. The verse repeats v’chiper – and he will atone three times in the context of a chatas: once in the section of a chatas of a king, once in the section of an individual goat chatas, and once in the section of an individual sheep chatas. The braisa starts by analyzing what I may have thought about the requirements for a chatas, without any special verse. I may have compared it to sacrifices whose blood is applied on the lower half of the altar, which are valid with one application, but I may have compared it to the blood which is brought into the building of the Bais Hamikdash, which is only valid if all four applications are done. Although the first comparison is valid because both sacrifices are applied outside, but the second comparison is more logical, since both sacrifices are chatas ones, and both are supposed to be applied to four corners, as opposed to others, which are not chatas ones, and only need two applications on the lower half. Therefore, the verse repeats v’chiper three times, each time including more cases which will atone. The first one includes one who applies only three times, the second one includes one who applies only two times, and the last one includes one who applies even only once.

Rava explains that bar Ada Mari explained that we do not need these v’chiper phrases to teach that the sacrifice atones, since the word v’nislach – and it will be forgiven, which is used in each, teaches that already. Therefore, these three phrases are extra, teaching us that only one is necessary to make the sacrifice valid. (38a)

Where to Apply?

The Gemora asks why we do not use these phrases to include one who applied four times, but in the wrong location. The first one would include one who applied three on the corners, and one on the bottom half, the second one would include one who applied two on the corners, and two on the bottom half, and the last would include one who applied all four on the bottom half.

Rav Ada bar Yitzchak objected, saying that this would undermine the concept of applying on the corners, but the Gemora reject this, as if the verse says this is valid, then it is valid, leaving the corners as the correct, but not critical, way to apply the blood.

Rather, Rava says that if the verse were including one who applied all in the bottom half, it would have made four inclusions, each for one application. The three inclusions are therefore referring to one who left out an application, and is teaching that up to three can be left out. We do not assume that the three include one who applied one on the corner, and the other three below, since we do not find blood which is applied in two different places.

The Gemora challenges this assertion from the following cases:

1. The Kohen Gadol would sprinkle the blood of the goat and bull on Yom Kippur once up and seven times down. The

Gemora deflects this, since it was in the same place, but simply aiming upwards or downwards.

2. The Mishna says that the Kohen Gadol would sprinkle from the blood seven times on taharo shel mizbeach – the pure place of the [inner] altar. The Gemora assumes this means the middle of the altar (like the term tihara – midday), which would lead to some of the blood above, and some below. The Gemora deflects this, saying it means the revealed top (like the term latohar – pure and clear).

3. The leftover blood of the sacrifices was spilled at the base of the altar, a different place than the application. The Gemora deflects this, saying that this was not necessary to make the sacrifice valid, and we are only asserting that to make a sacrifice valid, the blood is never applied in two different places.

4. The leftover blood of sacrifices that are applied on the inner golden altar was spilled at the base of the outer altar, and some say this was necessary to make the sacrifice valid. The Gemora deflects this, since these were two different altars, and we are only asserting that there are never applications in two different places on the same altar which are necessary to make it valid. (38a – 38b)

Strict or Lenient?

Rabbi Eliezer ben Yaakov says in a braisa that Bais Shamai holds that two applications in a chatas and one in other sacrifices are necessary to make the sacrifice valid, and are the minimum to make it piggul with improper planning, while Bais Hillel says that both sacrifices only require one, and become piggul with improper planning.

Rav Oshaya says that if this dispute is correctly recorded, this should be listed as an exception, where Bais Shamai is lenient, and Bais Hillel is strict, since one who improperly plans with one application of a chatas is piggul only according to Bais Hillel. Rava answers that although this follows from their dispute, their original dispute was about how many applications were necessary to make the sacrifice valid. Since

Bais Shamai is strict regarding this original dispute, it is not listed as an exception. (38b)

Status of Last Three Applications

Rabbi Yochanan says that the last three applications of a chatas may not be done at night (like other applications), may be done after the sacrifice's owner died (unlike other applications), and one is liable if he applied them outside of the Bais Hamikdash (like other applications).

Rav Pappa says that in some ways these applications are like the first (i.e., a bona fide service), but in some ways they are like the remaining blood that is spilled at the base of the altar, which is not a bona fide service.

It is like the first application in the following ways:

1. Outside – if one applied them outside of the Bais Hamikdash, he is liable for offering a sacrifice outside.
2. Non-Kohanim – a non Kohen who applied them is liable.
3. Vessels – they must be done with a kli shares – a service vessel.
4. Corner – they must be applied on the corner.
5. Finger – they must be applied with the Kohen's finger.
6. Washing – if the blood spilled on clothing before the last three applications, the clothing must be washed.
7. Leftover – blood leftover from these three applications must be spilled at the base.

It is like leftover blood in the following ways:

1. Death – if the owner died, they may still be applied.
2. Doesn't permit – it is not necessary to make the sacrifice's meat permitted to eat.
3. Doesn't make piggul – applying them while planning to eat the sacrifice improperly does not make the sacrifice piggul.
4. Inside the building – if the blood was brought inside the building of the Bais Hamikdash, it does not invalidate the sacrifice.

Rav Pappa proves that this blood requires clothing that it touches to be washed from a Mishna. The Mishna says that if the blood splashed onto clothing from the throat of the animal, from the corner where it was applied, or from the base of the altar, the clothing need not be washed. The Mishna implies that if blood that was not yet on the corner, but was ready to be applied there, splashed onto it, the clothing must be washed.

The Gemora objects, since the same logic would imply that blood that was ready to be spilled at the base that splashed would require the clothing to be washed, but the verse says that only blood that will be applied – not blood that already was applied – requires the clothing to be washed.

Rather, this Mishna must follow the opinion of Rabbi Nechemia, who says that if one applied leftover blood outside, he is liable, and therefore he would also say that blood that has been applied still requires clothing to be washed. The Mishna is therefore not a proof to Rav Pappa, who says that only the blood of the three last applications requires the clothing to be washed.

The Gemora attempts to deflect this, saying that perhaps Rabbi Nechemia only says that one is liable for applying it outside, but would not say that the leftover blood requires washing clothing. The Gemora responds that Rabbi Nechemia does say the leftover blood is bona fide blood, both for applying outside, and for washing clothing.

The Gemora proves this from a braisa, which says that blood that is ready to be spilled at the base is valid blood in three ways:

1. It makes clothing require washing.
2. One who planned to eat the sacrifice improperly when spilling it invalidates the sacrifice.
3. If one applies it outside, he is liable.

However, blood that is already invalid, and must be spilled into the canal of the courtyard, has none of these properties.

This braisa must be authored by Rabbi Nechemia, since it says that one who applies leftover blood outside is liable, and it also says that clothing that it touches must be washed. (38b – 39a)

INSIGHTS TO THE DAF

Top and Bottom

The Gemora asserts that we never have an instance of blood, whose application is split between two levels of the altar. The Gemora challenges this from the applications on the inner altar on Yom Kippur, which the Mishna states was on taharo of the altar, which the Gemora assumes means the middle of the altar. Rashi explains that since it is impossible to be precisely at the midpoint, and therefore some of the blood will be above, and some will be below, putting it in two places.

Tosfos (38a ma'y) offers another explanation. Before this application the blood was placed on the corners of the altar. The Gemora is thus saying that the blood is applied in two places – first on the corners, and then at the midpoint, which is below the corners.

One or Two for Piggul?

Rabbi Eliezer ben Yaakov says that just as Bais Shamai dispute how many applications are necessary for the chatas to be valid, they also dispute how many must be done with improper planning to make it piggul. Rashi explains that if one improperly thought with only one application, Bais Shamai say it is not piggul, since it is only half of the matir – permitting act of application, and piggul cannot be done with half a matir.

Tosfos (38b v'lisniyai) suggests that Bais Shamai may say that half a matir is enough for piggul, but the debate is when one applied the first one with improper planning, and then the blood spilled. In such a case, Bais Hillel would consider it piggul, since all the necessary blood was applied, but Bais Shamai would consider it not piggul, since the sacrifice invalid, since not all necessary blood was applied.

Tosfos notes that the Tosefta records the dispute about piggul specifically in this case, suggesting that this may be the correct understanding of Bais Shamai's position. However, Tosfos deflects that perhaps the Tosefta is only using this case to emphasize that Bais Hillel consider one application sufficient.

Tosfos notes that if Bais Shamai rule that half a matir can make piggul, Bais Shamai rule more strictly even in a piggul case – when the first application was done correctly, and the second one was done with improper planning. Bais Hillel will rule leniently in this case, since the sacrifice has already been technically completed with the first application. If so, the Gemora could have said that this dispute is not considered an exception, since even in this case of piggul, Bais Shamai is strict. Tosfos suggests that since this case of piggul is never explicitly mentioned in the Tosefta or any braisa, the Gemora did not consider that enough to consider this a case of Bais Shamai ruling strictly.

It's Rabbi Nechemia

Rav Pappa listed the ways that the latter applications of a chatas are like the first one, and the ways they are like the leftover blood. Rav Pappa cited a Mishna to prove that for the purposes of having to wash clothing that it contacts, it is like the first application. The Mishna stated that blood which fell from the corner or base of the altar does not necessitate washing clothing, and Rav Pappa inferred that blood destined for the corner does, thus including the latter applications. The Gemora challenged this inference, since the same logic would imply that blood destined for the base, i.e., leftover blood, necessitates washing, which is incorrect. The Gemora then states that this Mishna is Rabbi Nechemia's opinion, who says that leftover blood is valid blood, so one would be liable for offering it outside of the Bais Hamikdash.

Just as he would consider it valid for the prohibition of offering outside, so also he would consider it valid for washing.

Rashi explains that this statement is a continuation of the challenge to Rav Pappa's proof, and the Gemora is saying that this Mishna cannot be used to prove Rav Pappa's position, since it is Rabbi Nechemia, who considers blood valid for much longer than anyone else. Therefore, this Mishna has no bearing on Rav Pappa's statement, which follows the Sages.

Tosfos (38b Ha mani) suggests that this statement is Rav Pappa's response to the Gemora's challenge. Rav Pappa is saying that indeed both inferences are correct, and this Mishna follows Rabbi Nechemia. However, just as Rabbi Nechemia considers any blood which one may not offer outside to be valid blood for purposes of washing clothes, so would the Sages. This would include the blood of the latter applications as well. See Tosfos for more detailed discussion of how to read the continuation of the Gemora according to both approaches.
